

How can I get my partner to attend a program?

Many women want to support their partners in making better choices and behaving non-violently. It is important to remember that his behaviour and choices are his responsibility.

Your efforts are best used to make sure your needs and your children's needs are looked after.

What should I do while he is in the group?

Women who have been wrongly harmed often appreciate speaking with people that understand what they have been through. Counselling or a support group can be a safe place to decide how you can best protect yourself and your children and what you want to do.

What should I expect during my partner's counselling?

A staff person should be in touch with you. You will be offered information about the program and about safety planning. You will be given referral information for counseling, support and if appropriate, legal services for you and your children.

If you want, staff can let you know about the length and content of the program, but they will not tell you about the discussions that take place with your partner.

You have the right to your privacy and do not have to respond to any requests or questions by program staff.
